Model Answer #1

Response:

The provided picture illustrates the design of a public library today in comparison to 20 years ago. Overall, the most significant change is that today's library offers much more than just a place for books. Dedicated rooms now serve a variety of functions, contrasting with the previous design, which primarily focused on traditional book-related activities, although one room was designated for recreational use.

The main areas in both the current and past designs still serve the same purpose of providing access to books, even though their interiors differ significantly. In the earlier design, there were chairs and a couple of tables positioned centrally within the building, but these have since been removed, leaving the center of the floor open. In addition to the book collections, the current library features an information desk and self-service machines.

Regarding the four designated rooms, each has a specific purpose. Starting from the top-left corner, the initial room was intended for relaxation and entertainment, equipped with gaming facilities. It has now evolved into a more interactive space combined with a children's fiction section, transforming it into an area that promotes both play and reading. Meanwhile, the children's books that were previously located in the top-right corner room have been moved, and that room is now utilized as a lecture hall.

For the two rooms near the entrance, the design has changed significantly as well. The inquiry desk that was located on the right side has been converted into a café, while the reading room on the left is now functioning as a computer room. These changes illustrate how this library has transformed from a simple library into a versatile community space that offers a wide range of amenities.

The illustrations provide information about the changes taking place in the central library over a 20-year period. Overall, the library underwent substantial changes to include more recreational services and modernization while the main structure of the building remained unchanged.

In the previous plan, there were two large tables surrounded by eight chairs each, located in the center, but they have been removed from the latest plan. A cafe has replaced the inquiry desk, accompanied by the addition of three self-service machines to the north of it. Furthermore, all adult fiction books have been transferred to the right-hand-side corridor while reference books took their place in the left-hand-side one.

Accommodating two sofas and children's fiction books, the northeast room has been extended where once was a place for multimedia purposes. Eventually, the northwest section, which once held children's books, has now been replaced with a lecture room. In contrast, the only thing that remained constant in its place is the entrance door, to the south of the structure.

The present public central library has undergone significant changes, particularly in terms of technology. In contrast, 20 years ago, it was more primitive. Response:

The maps, which illustrate how a twenty-year redevelopment has transformed the Central Library, can be divided into two main sections: the western part and the eastern part.

Two decades ago, visitors would find two groups of tables and chairs immediately upon entering the library; these have since disappeared. To the left of the entrance, a reading room that housed newspapers and magazines has been transformed into a computer room. The area above this room, which previously contained adult fiction books, is now dedicated to reference books. On the upper left-hand side of the library, the room for CDs, videos, and computer games has been eliminated, and the children's area has been relocated from the opposite corner, expanded to accommodate storytelling events and sofas.

In the upper right-hand corner of the library, a lecture room now occupies the space where the children's zone once was. Below the lecture room, there is an area dedicated to adult fiction books, an information desk, and self-service machines that previously handled only adult non-fiction books. One of the most noticeable changes is the addition of a new café in the location that used to house the inquiry desk for tickets and book returns.

Overall, the redevelopment has led to significant changes, shifting the library's focus toward technology, self-service, and recreation. This new direction is evident in the addition of a computer room, self-service machines, a café, and storytelling areas that have replaced older features such as reading rooms and inquiry desks. Despite these upgrades, certain zones, such as the entrance, have retained their original design, while some items, like adult fiction books, were relocated rather than removed or altered.
